

The log file maintained by a DBMS is used, possibly in conjunction with hardware that listens to the communication between a computer and the storage controller to create cache buffers and a locking mechanism that enable applications running on one computer system to consistently access the data maintained and updated by a different computer.